INTRODUCTION:

The goal of all of the changes discussed and approved for the graduate programs by the graduate professors of the English Department has been to comply with Certification 38 and to specifically reduce the time to degree without compromising our commitment to our students acquiring in depth knowledge of the areas of English Literature and Linguistics (MA), and Caribbean Anglophone Literature and Language (Ph.D.). Moreover, the revised programs are intended to promote research and creativity on the part of our graduate students, encourage their abilities in critical thinking, and enable them to communicate effectively with academic peers, future students, and the public.

MA PROGRAM:

The English MA has two specializations: Literature and Linguistics. The most significant change to the MA in each area would be the proposed elimination of the MA exam and the change of the MA thesis (0 credits) to a research project course (3 credits). Discussed and considered by both the Graduate Committee and the English Department over the course of more than a year, the final vote on these changes was approved on March 12, 2014.

Currently, graduate students complete coursework in the areas tested in the MA exam. Moreover, the exam does not necessarily require the application of knowledge and skills developed through coursework. A research course provides opportunities to do so. On the other hand, this course would require a more effective use of the theoretical and practical background provided by curricula in our program. In fact, a research project demands the application of higher thinking skills such as problem solving, comparing information, and analyzing novel data.

The manuscript resulting from a research project includes the same components required by a thesis. Both consist of a literature review, methodology (if applicable), justification, analysis, and conclusions. Through the research course, the students develop similar or better skills than by combining the exam and thesis. Finally, students will finish their degree in a shorter time with the research course-essay sequence than with the exam-thesis sequence. This complies with new time-to-degree requirements from Certificación 38 (Section 5, D.4.).

A course modification request for INGL 5005 was submitted and approved. The course received a code number change to INGL 6205 and now incorporates graduate level readings, which provides students with preparation in academic writing. By changing the course number, the course that will count towards the thirty (30) credits of coursework required for the degree. We include six (6) credits of free electives plus a course (3 credits) in linguistics for literature students and in literature for linguistic majors. Since our department has literature and linguistic components, we expect students to become acquainted with both areas. In fact, we have had many students who write an interdisciplinary thesis after taking these courses. Therefore, this fosters interdisciplinary research among our students.

Although the total number of MA credits, 30, remains the same, there have been some changes to the makeup of these courses designed to enable students to finish this MA more quickly than in the past by adding flexibility. The rules regarding courses selected from specific areas have been relaxed somewhat. And with permission, MA students can enroll in appropriate 8000 level courses to satisfy course requirements. In addition, we propose to change the foreign language requirement from 9 credits to 6 credits. Language courses designed for graduate students consist of six (6) credits hours. Regular language courses require more contact hours than a regular course (including those designed for graduate students), so students are exposed to a greater amount of input in the language.

PH.D. PROGRAM:

One of the most significant changes in the Ph.D. has been to have the position paper written in INGL 8099 (taken the semester before the Comprehensive Exam) satisfy the completion of what was formerly the main area of the Comprehensive Exam. The exam course INGL 8890 will then cover the two other areas in Caribbean Literature or Linguistics in a written exam to be given near the end of the semester. In addition, INGL 8099 included a 100 item annotated bibliography. This was changed to a minimum of 30 items. Because the doctoral student submits other bibliographies: for the two areas of the Comprehensive Exam, for the Dissertation Proposal (INGL 8891) and, of course, the dissertation (INGL 8892), this was felt to be an appropriate change, focused on time to degree.

Despite the fact that the total number of credits (36) was not reduced, another significant change is that previously doctoral students were required to have taken primarily two Caribbean specific 6000 level courses, not all of which counted toward the degree, chosen from: (a) INGL 6410, INGL 6486, INGL 6489 for students in the literature track; and (b) INGL 6045, INGL 6469, INGL 6457 for students in linguistics. The number of courses to fulfill requirements in this section was reconsidered and the credits for every course taken will count toward the total credits of the Ph.D.

In addition, to add greater flexibility, students are required to take not two, but one, course in the other area (e.g. a Literature student was required to take two Linguistics courses, but will now only be required to take one). We include six (6) credits of free electives plus a course (3 credits) in linguistics for literature students and in literature for linguistic majors. Since our department has literature and linguistic components, we expect students to become acquainted with both areas. In fact, we have had many students who write an interdisciplinary dissertation after taking these courses. Therefore, this fosters interdisciplinary research among our students.

In addition, we propose to change the foreign language requirement from 9 credits to 6 credits. Language courses designed for graduate students consist of six (6) credits hours. Regular language courses require more contact hours than a regular course (including those designed for graduate students), so students are exposed to a greater amount of input in the language.

We look forward to further improving our Ph.D. program, particularly in the direction of a “fast track” MA/PHD in the future. The final Ph.D. Committee meeting considering changes to the doctoral program was February 26, 2014, and the English Department approved on March 12, 2014.

Next semester we should revise the position paper guidelines.	We will evaluate whether the improved guidelines are working through the evaluation of future position papers through the editing and evaluations of subsequent committees. (Each Ph.D. program professor is on INGL 8099 committees almost every semester.)

		m, European Romanticism and Transcendentalism, neurosis and nature, Manifest Destiny, and alternative belief systems.
Pensamiento crítico	INGL 8890 Writing of Critical Doctoral Essays (Ph.D. Exam)	Developed a wholistic rubric (attached) to evaluate and grade critical thinking for 1 Ph.D. Exam of this semester in Caribbean Linguistics.	The wholistic rubric was surprisingly useful in focusing the evaluation of how successful the doctoral student's critical thinking was.	Develop rubrics specifically focused on Caribbean literatura vs. Caribbean linguistics. This should be addressed by the Ph.D. Committee in the near future.	Compare the results of the two new rubrics to each other and subjective evaluations of the Ph.D. exams.
	INGL 6900: MA Exam	Developed a rubric (attached) to evaluate the critical thinking presented in the written MA exams for both Literture and Linguistics.	This rubric was less wholistic, more points based.	Probably versions of both the wholistic Ph.D. exam rubric and the points-based MA exam rubric could be adapted for both levels = 2 rubrics per exam. This would have to be taken up by both the Graduate Committee and the Ph.D. Committee	Compare the revised exams against each other and with the evaluation results of non-rubric (traditional, more subjective) evaluation.

II. Información adicional

Describa brevemente las actividades de avalúo realizadas en el programa durante el año académico 2013-2014. Indique cuáles instrumentos fueron utilizados para recopilar información y cómo fueron desarrollados. Discuta los resultados obtenidos y qué acciones transformadoras se planifican ejecutar basadas en esos resultados.

Evaluation of graduate student learning and graduate student programs in the English Department Graduate Program have included:

1. Evaluating MA and Ph.D. requirements in the light of Cert. 38. Evaluating changes made by other UPR Humanities Graduate Programs and assessing what direction our own changes should be taking to ensure student learning at both levels. Our changes were submitted to the Junta Graduada and approved this semester.
2. Evaluating ways to help students complete both MA and Ph.D. sooner while maintaining the quality of the degrees and ensuring that they are learning everything they need to. Recommendations are ongoing.
3. Evaluating students' progress in theses and dissertations. We plan closer monitoring of students in the dissertation and thesis stage. Our new MA will substitute a research project for the traditional thesis.
4. Evaluating PEA students' learning and performance in covering their duties as research assistants. This program appears to be in a budgetary crisis and whether we can make any improvements remains to be seen.
5. Evaluating student participation in the semi-annual English Department graduate student conference: Caribbean without Borders and the annual UPR sponsored conference: Eastern Caribbean Islands-In-Between Conference.
